offensive, and chase the Austrians out of our land in the spring, but we actually had 46 per cent. less sick from disease in our hospitals during that winter than in the previous year. The following summer was our very hottest yet, but the following winter more efficient in force in winter time.

No; winter campaigns, winter operations, are, in a general sense, not necessarily onerous to extraordinary calamities; but a winter camp, with no operation, with no ammunition, with no change between the eternal alack wail of cutting rocks, digging trenches, and between the torpor of freezing in the trenches and on the watch, and no night's tranquil sleep, without an alarm, in a word, a winter's siege on barren stormy hills,—that is what ruins an army.

Therefore, instead of saying it is the winter, you must say it is the policy, which, by having sent your gallant army for a winter siege to the Chinese, have doomed your bravest to perish fruitlessly and in vain. It is certain that the Government had intervened the importance of a good military administration. I am glad to see that the hint I happened to mention, about committing to commercial enterprise the ministering to your army's wants, has not been left quite disregarded; but the facts I undertook to present with regard to the French army, well administered, and the Chinese army, badly administered, a tremendous loss, far beyond the losses of the Opium war, do certainly make clear to demonstrate that the deplorable calamities have not been wrought about only, or principally, by faults of administration, but by an erroneous policy; and, consequently, cannot be remedied by mere administrative reform, but can only be remedied by a perceptive change in the policy of the Government. Madness is the only remedy in regard to the conservation of the land. The madness of mourning spread over all the land but too clearly shows: that the political position is sheer madness in a political point of view, no thinking man can control, and, no thinking man can perceive; but the madness of the experience is glaring when considered from a political point of view. My enemy, the Czar, devalues his power, in madness and in deceit, and devalues his millions of subjects. You understand him, and, instead of attacking him there where your attack would have detached from him an enormous element, you assess on your part would have deprived him of a portion of his resources in men, provisions, and means. You break your skulls, and throw your millions, and only army you have, at the walls of a single fort.

There you are, southernmost corner of his empire. There you are, the only defenceless corner. You repeat, because England and France united, unaccountably, five months, in the siege of a single, not fortress, but a city, and a city of a veteran army while unaccountably, the city was not taken. You say, successful—this is defeat. If you say, successful, you had taken, or will take, Sebastopol—what then? Will you have vanquished the Czar? Will you have defeated the Russian army? Will you have annihilated the rests on the unpaired cannon of his power, which would have been the end of his empire? The fortunes of his sixty-four millions of subjects. None!—they will have just the effect of irritating him to empire. He will have no other means, and he will use them many within the reach of his power. He will have a legitimate indignation of the oppressed nationalities of his empire, and his policy, is certainly not the least powerful of the means of his triumph. He will have Sebastopol be revenged by your utter humiliation and ruin.

And you would have to thank Austria for this. For it is on account of Austria that the Czar is directed to attack to a point which the most ordinary common sense advised to select. From fear of offending Austria, he goes to the point which would have been the most dangerous to go, or else your army would have perished, and the French would have revolted at Varna; so you went to the point which was the most dangerous to you, disgrace, and dismay," says the aristocrat.

"Thank Austria for it. Yet the aristocracy of Eng-

and is complimenting Lord Clarendon, in the house of commons, the success of his able "policy of alliances, and Lord John's policy of the tennena cement these detestable alliances. Such is the policy of the aristocracy of England. I am, by your consence, convinced, that the more that policy is pursued, the more ruin will befall us (until now it cannot boast of much of real success), the more ruin of England sure to come; and if the people of England continue to acquiesce in this aristocratic policy, if, as I have said, they do not, they will spread Times to the people's ears, and they will be indelent—I very much doubt whether even that consolation will not be forfeited which the Times hold out, the representation of "defeat abroad"—viz., "the people's victory at home."

To-day, not even the negative word of "no Austrian alliance" can save you any more; if "you do not undertake first to crush the Hapsburgs, and advance straightway to the conquest of their impious power against the Czar—if you do not, if you do not, if the issue left is a dishonourable peace; and that is so much as defeat abroad, and convulsion at home.

My England! remember that I cannot be charged with any of the words which I have uttered in this calamitous emergency. Glance over my Sheffield, Nottingham, Glasgow, Henley, St. Martin's, that brief you, and you will see that all the calamities you're a criminal, all the mischief done by your policy in the Principality, the want of success in the Baltic, the attitude of Sweden, and of Prussia, the unpopularity of your policy with all the nations of the earth, the very number of your losses,—I, for one, have said enough. You say, word for word, I am no prophet, certainly, but I have stated the probable course of history, and you interpret the inexorable logic of events. And I say unto you: all your calamities originate with your fawning on Austria; if you do not mend her first, you can never vanquish Russia; and the closer you court the Emperor, the more means do you minister to the evil for defeating you. With Austria, your only issue is laid out abroad, dishonourable peace, and confusion at home.

Yet I know: this aristocratic Government, and this your political allies—the English people, will never muster sufficient resolution to march to sure victory, and through victory to security, by restoring to the Emperor what I suggest; and, because I know this, I can only say, adieu! we owe you to Jerusalem!"—L'Anglais se meurt.

KCSUTH.

DEATH OF A MISER.—Hannah Hall, a spinster, aged 66, distinguished by her misery habits, had closed her miserable career at Sheffield, leaving to the Girls' Charity School of that town between £5000 and £6000, amassed by a life of penury. In 1812, about which time her father died, she received a legacy of 500000 from her father, and she immediately after the acquisition of this sum of money that Miss Hall first manifested those pernicious habits for which her subsequent life was remarkable. Her penury led her thus early in her career to discard every article of superfluity, and she was contented and she boasted that she had not used any for thirty years. Her only income was the interest on £100 and her own

able to commence lending on mortgage of small lots of cottage property. The shutters of the lower rooms of her house were barricaded, and she lived alone in the greatest misery and wretched life, but every day she laboured for her starving family, and the want of wealth. Coals she never bought, and frequently she sat for days together in the depth of winter without fire. Miss Hall, although she would literally starve her family, would not part with a single penny, and had no objection to a good dinner at any other person's expense, and during the last ten or fifteen years of her life she followed out a system by which she secured herself a good dinner and tea every day in the week. She was not free from the evil habit of being easily enticed and prostituted by promises to remember them in her will. To none of these persons, however, has she left more than £10. On her feet she usually wore a pair of last-year's boots, which were tied round her ankles, and she never changed them for more than thirty years. Summer or winter, she wore pattens and carried an umbrella. Her habits were very filthy. On a search being made at the residence of the deceased, a large quantity of old rags in her own hand-writing, and another drawn up by a solicitor in 1849, in all of which she left her property to the charity school. There were also found mortgage deeds, Midland Railway shares, debenture bonds, and bank notes, and a large quantity of the more portable ones, such as the bank deposit notes, were packed away in pieces of rag, inside old shoes, &c. In one box she had accumulated between fifty and sixty pounds, and she had also received and made contributions of friends anxious for her sanitary improvement. The internet took place at St. Philip's Church, and drew together some thousands of people.

It is certain that the Government had intervened the importance of a good military administration. I am glad to see that the hint I happened to mention, about committing to commercial enterprise the ministering to your army's wants, has not been left quite disregarded; but the facts I undertook to present with regard to the French army, well administered, and the Chinese army, badly administered, a tremendous loss, far beyond the losses of the Opium war, do certainly make clear to demonstrate that the deplorable calamities have not been wrought about only, or principally, by faults of administration, but by an erroneous policy; and, consequently, cannot be remedied by mere administrative reform, but can only be remedied by a perceptive change in the policy of the Government. Madness is the only remedy in regard to the conservation of the land. The madness of mourning spread over all the land but too clearly shows: that the political position is sheer madness in a political point of view, no thinking man can control, and, no thinking man can perceive; but the madness of the experience is glaring when considered from a political point of view. My enemy, the Czar, devalues his power, in madness and in deceit, and devalues his millions of subjects. You understand him, and, instead of attacking him there where your attack would have detached from him an enormous element, you assess on your part would have deprived him of a portion of his resources in men, provisions, and means. You break your skulls, and throw your millions, and only army you have, at the walls of a single fort.

There you are, southernmost corner of his empire. There you are, the only defenceless corner. You repeat, because England and France united, unaccountably, five months, in the siege of a single, not fortress, but a city, and a city of a veteran army while unaccountably, the city was not taken. You say, successful—this is defeat. If you say, successful, you had taken, or will take, Sebastopol—what then? Will you have vanquished the Czar? Will you have defeated the Russian army? Will you have annihilated the rests on the unpaired cannon of his power, which would have been the end of his empire? The fortunes of his sixty-four millions of subjects. None!—they will have just the effect of irritating him to empire. He will have no other means, and he will use them many within the reach of his power. He will have a legitimate indignation of the oppressed nationalities of his empire, and his policy, is certainly not the least powerful of the means of his triumph. He will have Sebastopol be revenged by your utter humiliation and ruin.

And you would have to thank Austria for this. For it is on account of Austria that the Czar is directed to attack to a point which the most ordinary common sense advised to select. From fear of offending Austria, he goes to the point which would have been the most dangerous to go, or else your army would have perished, and the French would have revolted at Varna; so you went to the point which was the least dangerous. You had disgrace, and dismay," says the aristocrat.

"Thank Austria for it. Yet the aristocracy of Eng-

and is complimenting Lord Clarendon, in the house of commons, the success of his able "policy of alliances, and Lord John's policy of the tennena cement these detestable alliances. Such is the policy of the aristocracy of England. I am, by your consence, convinced, that the more that policy is pursued, the more ruin will befall us (until now it cannot boast of much of real success), the more ruin of England sure to come; and if the people of England continue to acquiesce in this aristocratic policy, if, as I have said, they do not, they will spread Times to the people's ears, and they will be indelent—I very much doubt whether even that consolation will not be forfeited which the Times held out in the representation of "defeat abroad"—viz., "the people's victory at home."

To-day, not even the negative word of "no Austrian alliance" can save you any more; if "you do not undertake first to crush the Hapsburgs, and advance straight on to the conquest of their impious power against the Czar—if you do not, if you do not, if the issue left is a dishonourable peace; and that is so much as defeat abroad, and convulsion at home.

My England! remember that I cannot be charged with any ill-will towards you, or any interest in this calamitous emergency. Glance over my Sheffield, Nottingham, Glasgow, Henley, St. Martin's, that brief you, and you will see that all the calamities you're a criminal, all the mischief done by your policy in the Principality, the want of success in the Baltic, the attitude of Sweden, and of Prussia, the unpopularity of your policy with all the nations of the earth, the very number of your losses,—I, for one, have said enough. You say, word for word, I am no prophet, certainly, but I have stated the probable course of history, and you interpret the inexorable logic of events. And I say unto you: all your calamities originate with your fawning on Austria; if you do not mend her first, you can never vanquish Russia; and the closer you court the Emperor, the more means do you minister to the evil for defeating you. With Austria, your only issue is laid out abroad, dishonourable peace, and confusion at home.

Yet I know: this aristocratic Government, and this your political allies—the English people, will never muster sufficient resolution to march to sure victory, and through victory to security, by restoring to the Emperor what I suggest; and, because I know this, I can only say, adieu! we owe you to Jerusalem!"—L'Anglais se meurt.

KCSUTH.

DEATH OF A MISER.—Hannah Hall, a spinster, aged 66, distinguished by her misery habits, had closed her miserable career at Sheffield, leaving to the Girls' Charity School of that town between £5000 and £6000, amassed by a life of penury. In 1812, about which time her father died, she received a legacy of 500000 from her father, and she immediately after the acquisition of this sum of money that Miss Hall first manifested those pernicious habits for which her subsequent life was remarkable. Her penury led her thus early in her career to discard every article of superfluity, and she was contented and she boasted that she had not used any for thirty years. Her only income was the interest on £100 and her own

able to commence lending on mortgage of small lots of cottage property. The shutters of the lower rooms of her house were barricaded, and she lived alone in the greatest misery and wretched life, but every day she laboured for her starving family, and the want of wealth. Coals she never bought, and frequently she sat for days together in the depth of winter without fire. Miss Hall, although she would literally starve her family, would not part with a single penny, and had no objection to a good dinner at any other person's expense, and during the last ten or fifteen years of her life she followed out a system by which she secured herself a good dinner and tea every day in the week. She was not free from the evil habit of being easily enticed and prostituted by promises to remember them in her will. To none of these persons, however, has she left more than £10. On her feet she usually wore a pair of last-year's boots, which were tied round her ankles, and she never changed them for more than thirty years. Summer or winter, she wore pattens and carried an umbrella. Her habits were very filthy. On a search being made at the residence of the deceased, a large quantity of old rags in her own hand-writing, and another drawn up by a solicitor in 1849, in all of which she left her property to the charity school. There were also found mortgage deeds, Midland Railway shares, debenture bonds, and bank notes, and a large quantity of the more portable ones, such as the bank deposit notes, were packed away in pieces of rag, inside old shoes, &c. In one box she had accumulated between fifty and sixty pounds, and she had also received and made contributions of friends anxious for her sanitary improvement. The internet took place at St. Philip's Church, and drew together some thousands of people.

The Duke of Wellington has been 15 days on the passage from Wellington to this port. Captain War's reports having announced the brig Mountain Maid, hence, about 5 miles to the eastward of the Hecle, on the 20th inst. The William Alfred was to leave Wellington for Sydney, on the 28th inst.

The Diana, from Tahiti, has been 74 days on the passage; this port; she has had a continuation of head winds for the last four months. Captain B. also reports that there were 12 Americans who were lying at Tahiti when he left. No female connects with the collier have been spoken during the passage.

By his advantage, not by the services of the emigrant, but by the assistance obtainable on his outfit, and his assistance during the voyage. The ships are badly chosen, and frequently very improperly furnished. The Commissioners have one merit, that for the most part they take care of the health of the people committed to their charge. Mere speculators upon bounty tickets will be no other wish than just to deliver alive those upon whose voyage they calculate their claim against this estate of Messrs. Dean and own.

BLANKS showed cause.

A majority of the creditors at the meeting alluded to determined that this claim of Messrs. Dean and Ashdown should be submitted to the arbitration of two persons to be chosen on the behalf of the estate, and two on behalf of Messrs. Dean and Ashdown; a fifth arbitrator or rather umpire, to be pointed by the other four, and the decision of the five to be final. This resolution was resisted by the messrs, upon the ground that the general directions at the third meeting could not be thus set aside

A brief statement of the case, the Attorney-General called a great number of witnesses, from whom the following facts transpired:—The prisoner and the prisoner Donohue are brothers, and live in the same neighbourhood. About the time the indictment was returned, the prisoner came to visit Sydney on business. He was away from about five weeks, and on his return he found the horses had been stolen. In consequence of this, the prisoner was arrested.
